

Visual	Text
Still-frame montage of 20th century libraries using Burns Effect	The first library was established centuries before the Roman Empire. Then and in the centuries since, libraries have held an important place in society, fulfilling an equally important role: Giving everyone equal access to information.
[computery stuff]	With the opening of the Internet and establishment of the World Wide Web in the late 1990s, the perception of libraries shifted. However, the reality is that libraries are just as—if not more—important now as they always have been.
Still-frames of Clemens then Steele libraries; both w/ Burns effect	School libraries are, perhaps, of greater import with young learners developing habits that will last them a lifetime, and the libraries at SCUC ISD's two high schools have adapted to serve the diverse needs of their diverse student populations.
Interspersed shots of Monica/Cari/aides working/presenting	In addition to checking out media to students, high school librarians assist teachers with instructional materials and even instruction on effective use of the library and all of its resources.
E-books/contemporary materials	Not too long ago, pretty-much the only medium for materials at school libraries was the traditional book. While still available, SCUC's libraries are not bound to books. Magazines, newspapers, and reference books—dictionaries, encyclopedias, atlases—are all available for use in-house, while audiobooks and e-books are available for checkout as standalone materials or deliverables to a student's own device.
Library Computers/Laptops	Of course, the most commonly utilized library resource, now, is the school computer, available to students before and after school with their school ID, or during the instructional day with a pass from their teacher.
montage of library database logos [video of pptx using fade-in effect]	SCUC libraries offer a wealth of resources beyond the limitations of the Internet. An expansive offering of databases—accessible for free only with codes provided by the school's libraries—connects students with relevant, academic material for research purposes, usable in any course they're enrolled in. Some databases even allow the archiving of information that can be used by students through their academic careers in SCUC—and beyond.
Montage of Clemens/Steele librarians assisting students	The libraries at Byron P. Steele, II and Samuel Clemens are each unique in their own way but common in their goal and in the dedication of their respective staff.
Continued montage (including IDs), ending with "on-high," wide-angle shot of Monica/aide, Carrie/aide centered & smiling	And the library science degreed professionals and their assistants in each library are here and ready to assist, be it in getting a new ID, finding the right resource for a class, or the right book for whatever mood you find yourself.
kid/media montage (fast transition)	Don't think of libraries as just some antediluvian institution from the times of Alexander the Great. Think of and see your school library as the invaluable resource to help make you great.

Dale Seiler 2/17/2016 6:20 AM

Comment [1]: If you wish to comment on something, highlight the word(s) and tap the comment (dialogue balloon) button. :)

Cari Weems 2/17/2016 6:20 AM

Comment [2]: I love it. I wouldn't change a thing!!!! I want to show the school board. Suggestion: we need a shot of the lunchtime crowd in here. THanks for doing this Dale!!!!